

What landscape are you facing?

We lead our own personal territory. We are the owners of our (wide or narrow) landscape upon which we make decisions every day. These places have nothing to do with physical features. They do not relate to your property, investments or finances.

The dimension of your personal territory depends on the choices and possibilities you are open to: You can have a very significant economic capital and yet still feel overwhelmed in your life or you can have recognition and prestige in your career and yet still panic when faced with new challenges. In short, our personal territory refers to the choices and possibilities you are open to and that you implement in your everyday movements, decisions, and relationships.

Do not compare your type of leadership with other great business persons or politicians and do not underestimate your leadership, if you're not in the headlines or on the covers of magazines. Leadership refers to the way one approaches life. Leadership relates to how open you are in your life to different possibilities. In some cases, one can lock oneself in a sole scenario that can be prestigious and involve wealth but which causes suffering and despair.

You live inside your creation. For this reason, the options you choose in your life open or close your territories. All of your external movements arise from your inner landscape. You live inside your creation. You must lead your inner landscape (emotionally expand your possibilities of life) to extend your possibility of decision making. If you want to change your oppression, you must change your landscape. Perhaps your properties, your fame and your finances are extensive, but emotionally your territory has become a lonely and boring island where the only alternative you have allowing time to walk in circles amongst your bewilderment.

Future affects the past

If I were to listen to the description of your landscape, it is possible that I could perceive your future. While this phrase may come across as a premonitory statement, that is not the intention. Your daily landscape is not limited by the living conditions of your present but rather in the potential of your future.

Your daily landscape is not limited by the living conditions of your present but rather in the potential of your future. The future defines the sense of transcendence of our personal purpose and, therefore, sets the boundaries of the horizon of both our individual and group development. Thus: the future affects the past. This concept may not correspond to the common belief that the past (what we have already lived) sets the limits of our present and determines our potential. The past establishes limitations on the present (which can be physical, psychological, economical or culture, etc.), but the limits are related to our own interpretations of these conditions and how we influence the internal negotiations that we establish when faced with these circumstances. We negotiate with daily events from the perspective of our personal horizon. We negotiate with our present based on the boundaries we have drawn for our future.

TRANSFORM YOUR FUTURE TO CHANGE YOUR PRESENT

The concept of 'Inner leadership' relates to the internal transformation of people to develop and sustain conditions for change in their lives. Three dimensions support this personal change: openness, creativity, and projection. Openness refers to "recognizing the new": the capability to explore new realities. Creativity relates to "developing the new": the decision to renew personal living conditions. Finally, the term projection is related to "holding the new": the commitment to support a purpose under new conditions of life.

The concept of 'inner leadership' involves your responsibility of the steps you take to expand your decision making possibilities. The inner leadership means recovering your mindful presence in the choices that define the landscape where you decide to live in. These choices are related to your perception of the world. "Our perception" (the lens through which we look at life) depends on the collection of choices that we have made in our daily lives. Based on this framework it is that we make decisions.